You always thought of lifeguards as total goof-offs whose only mission in life was to seek out and score as many chicks as possible. And in a sense, youd have a point. But what if I also told you that during the 1950s and 60s, when I served as an ocean lifeguard with the Atlantic City Beach Patrol, we averaged 5000 rescues a summer. With a lifeguard force of approximately 125 men, with two to each station, and 62 stations, we averaged over eight hundred rescues, per crew, a summer. Many of these rescues were routine, some serious and others downright dangerous. You will witness and experience all three categories as I take you along for the adventure. But basically, your initial assumption had some merit. This was a fun job, the envy of all who came in contact with us. As observers of people, we were privy to an unending goldmine of characters. A case in point was our thirty, something year old mascot whose job, he thought, was to make life as difficult as possible for us. There was the attractive lady who showed up one day to serenade my partner and me and then wouldnt leave. Youll get to know a group of women who fondly became known as the bitches. Or, of the lady, who, in her search for ocean treasures, got much more than she bargained for. Following a lifeboat crew, youll engage in the rescue of a bare bosomed woman whose heroic Lothario deserts her, for the safer confines of shallow water. There is much more however Romantic liaisons, between guards and gals, were a common occurrence...
