Excerpt: . . . the Office Protractor. The limb c d of the bevel is made to be taken a part at h by drawing c h out of a brass socket fastened to h d, for the purpose of packing it in the box. On each side of e d scales of equal parts may be made. In order to keep the bevel in its position against the edge of the protractor a small button i k is made to project on it from the groove and to be turned down in the direction i l to lie below the moveable limb when folded down. - This instrument, although not quite so expeditious in its operation as the Office Protractor, is yet so vastly superior to the common protractor, that surveyors who have had it in use have considered it such an essential part of their equipment...
