Each figure seems to have its name, although often the constructor cannot give the name of a figure he has made. Our usual procedure was to take down names in each language, whenever a figure was encountered; where possible new figures were photographed; prints were promptly made and a set of them was always carried for the identification of old and the discovery of new designs. The player often has less difficulty in naming a figure which he has upon his fingers, than in constructing it from the repeated name. This at first seems strange but is really natural. It was inconvenient for our work, . however; sometimes it was impossible to photograph a new figure at once, though quite easy to take down its name; later when we were ready to photograph, the player might not be able from the name to recall...
