The large arch at the Shaldon side of the river should be avoided by those unfamiliar with the Teign, as the force of the current there frequently renders it very dangerous. In crossing the harbour mouth, there is at half-tide a considerable eddy from the Point, which must be remembered and calculated for. With these few warnings kept in mind, boating in the Teign need be attended by no risks. There may be a tug against tide, or it is possible to get aground on a sandbank, but no treacherous rock lies below water ready to tear out the bottom of a boat, and there are many hours when the oars may be shipped and the boat allowed to drift on the gentle current without fear of any harm. Until 1853 the port...
